

"The Global Gold Mining Industry: Stakeholder Discourse and Indigenous Rights"

Dr. Michael L. Dougherty

Assistant Professor in the Department of Sociology and Anthropology, Illinois State University

Michael L. Dougherty's interests center broadly on the sociology of the environment, development, and rural livelihoods. Dougherty's most recent research explores the changing structures of the global gold mining industry and social dynamics around environmental conflicts in Central America. Dougherty also conducts research on community development, rural tourism, and the architecture of local food systems in the United States and beyond. He has authored twelve journal articles and book chapters and is currently co-editing an encyclopedia volume on sustainability in the Americas. Prior to attending graduate school, Dougherty lived for several years in Central America, initially as a Peace Corps Volunteer and later working in non-profit management and development consulting. Dougherty received his PhD from the University of Wisconsin-Madison in 2011.

Student Center Ballroom D
Wednesday, March 7, 6:00-7:30 PM

Hennebach-MIPER Speaker Series
Master of International Political Economy of Resources (MIPER) graduate program in LAIS